On Confidence

How important is self-confidence? According to Samuel Johnson, an English writer, “self-confidence is the first requisite to great undertakings.” In other words, when you have self-confidence, you have faith in your capabilities, your vision, and your future, and that makes you one step closer to your goal.

For one thing, if you are a confident person, a stronger-believer of your dream, when you emit the sense of confidence, you can easily attract people like you and persuade others to help you achieve your dream. That’s what Barack Obama did when he was running for U. S. presidency and what numerous people did before and after him in order to be successful. For another, when you have self-confidence, you can accomplish things even if others are not supportive. Such examples could be found on scientists and actors alike who proved their value to the world despite they were previously misunderstood or wrongfully judged by their loved ones.

While self-confidence won’t always guarantee that you will succeed in life, a confident person will have at least 10 times the chance of success of a person who lacks confidence. Therefore, one should not lose confidence under whatever circumstances.
